

SUSTAINABILITY:

How to run a Mobility Program
when the federal money has run out

By Dr. Nabil Bassim
Director, International Programs
Faculty of Engineering, University of Manitoba
September 9, 2008

Things to do when you still have the money

1. Develop a culture for mobility among students, professors and administrators (Dean of Faculty)
2. Expose your students to incoming students from different countries, languages and cultures
3. Develop internship programs with local industry (sponsors)
4. Establish course and grade equivalency rules and procedures with foreign partners
5. Sign bilateral agreements with your foreign partners
6. Work with the International Office

Things to do when you still have the money

1. Develop a culture for mobility among students, professors and administrators (Dean of Faculty)

Things to do when you still have the money

- 2. Expose your students to incoming students from different countries, languages and cultures

Things to do when you still have the money

- 3. Develop internship programs with local industry (sponsors)

Things to do when you still have the money

- 4. Establish course and grade equivalency rules and procedures with foreign partners

Things to do when you still have the money

- 5. Sign bilateral agreements with your foreign partners

Things to do when you still have the money

6. Work with the International Office

Things to do when the money has run out

1. Offer students the possibility to study abroad on their own (you will be surprised by how many want this)
2. Apply for internal funding (if available) to continue running the programs
3. Investigate with foreign partners establishing internships that pay students from research funding or local business in the host universities.
4. Stay in touch with your partner universities, in case opportunities develop for continuing the mobility program.

Things to do when the money has run out

1. Offer students the possibility to study abroad on their own.
(You will be surprised by how many want this)

Things to do when the money has run out

- 2. Apply for internal funding (if available) to continue running the programs

Things to do when the money has run out

3. Investigate with foreign partners establishing internships that pay students from research funding or local business in the host universities.

Things to do when the money has run out

- 4. Stay in touch with your partner universities, in case opportunities develop for continuing the mobility program.